

Hey, say, why don't adults like it when a child is "an old head on young shoulders"?

Clearly, the ways of the world and the rules of conduct and interaction are requisite knowledge in the adult world.

Adults without that knowledge will be left out in the cold at every turn and looked down upon by others. They wouldn't do well in society.

Yet when they see us learning this knowledge "prematurely", not only will they be unhappy, but they might even get angry or anxiety-ridden. Why is that?

Hm... Maybe adults think that speaking or acting on instinct is in a child's nature, so only children who are straightforward can be happy.

If a child thinks too much, adults will believe that they aren't happy.

But I chose to "think too much",
which proves that I like doing so.
Receiving other people's approval
would make me happy.

If the trade-off of my straightforwardness is the offence of others, then the disadvantaged party still ends up being me.
That would make me unhappy instead.

Why do they have to arbitrarily decide how
I should act to be happy?
They're not me.

Why is it that for those who are slightly older, the maturity of the mind is worth promoting, but younger people with a mature mind will on the contrary feel fake to people?

You overlooked this point: hypocritical people, whether young or old, will be despised by others.

Even for an adult, once it's discovered that this person talks and acts insincerely, people will instinctively feel repulsion towards them.

If other people find you fake, it actually shows that your intellect isn't developed enough, and that your unsuccessful disguise was seen through.

If you were truly sufficiently mature, you should be able to act to the point that people can't see through you.

If people dislike you, it means that you're still half-baked.

For our age group,
outspokenness is a privilege,
so it will actually be enjoyed by the adults.

If you want to show a self that other people will be most fond of, you also have to consider both their status and yours before acting out.

Therefore, if what you're seeking is the development of your intellect, then you still have a long way to go. As the saying goes, great wisdom may appear foolish and great skills can seem clumsy.

Having contemplated something myriad times in your head, yet behaving as if it is the result of intuition, that is genuine sagacity.

Blue! Stop playing, time to go home!

Whisper

Think over
what I said!

Ah~ Can I play
for a bit longer?

Just five more minutes!

Ohh, look at this kid! Acting precocious all the time, yet once he sees the toys, sure enough, he won't budge anymore! So cute~
Okay, play for a bit longer!

Hahaha

Smile

Smile

Goldwish Pond

Author: Ocarina

Raws: Caek

Translation & Editing: Serin

QC: Rosie & Thea

Thank you for reading!

Visit us at:

goldwishpond.wordpress.com